Anthropology is the study of humans, past and present. Anthropology can include the study of language, biology, or ancient things. Anthropologists learn about native cultures. There are about 370 million native people in 70 countries worldwide. Every group or tribe of native people has a unique culture and language. Native people have lived in harmony with nature for a long time. Anthropologists also study how modern societies create meaning. They compare societies. The American Anthropological Association says that DNA research shows that genetic differences between races are few and minor. When we think about people based on skin color or other features we lose information about who they are as individuals. We are one human family.
